Mitochondria are the center of energy production for all cells. But they also function as a major source of free radicals in all cells, and are thought to be a primary source of free radicals in mitochondria of cardiomyocytes and skeletal muscle. In addition, mitochondria are the major site of apoptosis, particularly in cardiac myocytes. It is believed that apoptosis is a key mechanism that protects cardiomyocytes by eliminating cells that do not fulfill the physiological contractile function of the heart. Mitochondria have characteristic structures and they differ in various aspects from other subcellular organelles, such as bacteria, chloroplasts and endoplasmic reticulum, and from each other. Thus, considering the similarity and diversity of mitochondria, their function is expected to be regulated by multiple factors and mechanisms. We have been examining the coordination of cardiomyocyte and skeletal muscle mitochondria by an investigation of a specific regulator, peroxisome proliferator-activated receptor-gamma coactivator 1alpha (PGC-1alpha), in addition to its
