Recent studies have shown that rheumatoid arthritis is characterized by pathogenetic, structural, and clinical changes in the capillaries and small arteries of the synovium. These vascular lesions arise together with inflammatory infiltrations and are accompanied by an impaired trophic function of microvessels, including a deregulation of molecules responsible for coagulation and fibrinolysis, antiangiogenic factors, increased expression of antigens, adsorptive receptors, and impairment of vessel-wall integrity. Systemic and local blood markers of endothelial activation may be used in the search for markers of vascular lesions in the synovial membrane. These include hemostatic and fibrinolytic factors, cell adhesion molecules, endothelial microparticles, cytokines and, soluble factors (as heparanase and Dkk-1), growth factors (vascular endothelial edd6d56e20
