They are aware of the things that might happen in the following future, to the extent that they have planned for it in advance. They are also developing a day-one patch to address some of the mistakes on their part. I was able to have a 10-minute conversation with the producer, and I got the impression that, in spite of a number of problems with some of the features, they are already pretty certain about what direction they want to take, as well as the level of quality they want to keep. He is a former member of the development team of the game in the past. At the same time, he is someone in whose hands a lot of the current team members have had a hand. He is a team leader who has given a lot of responsibility to others. That alone makes him a person of high trust within the development team. He has had a very large part in the planning of the world, and it also has a great sense of unity. You can use both of your hands in a very open way. It also has a great sense of unity. We will be able to see very interesting gameplay. There will be a variety of dungeons. There will be a lot of quests and action. It is not to be mistaken for a 'traditional RPG'. We will be able to make our choices strongly influence the storyline. We will have a great sense of unity. There will be a serious lack of text. As for the combat, there will be multiple forms of damage. There will be two party members. Their story will be short, but we will be able to play out a great story. It will also include a great number of scenes. The movements of the characters will be very energetic. There is a lot of room to express the battle state. We will be able to 'fight with your hands'. bff6bb2d33
