Jina Moore told the Times that in November 2006 she and her husband submitted a photo of the child, who had died, along with more than 100 photos to the newspaper's photo archive. ADVERTISEMENT Moore said she was not aware at the time that it was an Associated Press photo — only later would she discover that the picture was taken by a photographer for The New York Post. "I only thought it was some daily paper," she explained. "They came back and said they needed it for the archive." What the newspaper did not tell her was that the photo had also been submitted to the Web site BabyGate.com, a site that had posted images of children that had died, and later was blocked by Google in response to a complaint from the New York Times. When Moore's photo showed up on the Web site, it was in an article by George A. Smith that was entitled "To Send a Photograph of Baby's Body." "I want to see her again," Moore said. "It's horrible to think about that baby all alone." ADVERTISEMENT The Web site that is hosting Moore's photo no longer exists, although Google shows ca3bfb1094

De Fréhel was born in Reims and died in Paris. He was a pupil of the painter Jean Baptiste de Champs and at some point became a resident of the royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture. He gained the reputation of an excellent portrait painter. He painted several portraits of Louis XV, the first from 1741 (remaining in the possession of the family of the painter) and several others from 1746. He painted many of the royal family of England; among them is the portrait of Princess Anne (1748), which belonged to the artist until the 20th century. His work, along with that of the Baroque painter Jacques-Philippe Le Bas, was included in the 18th-century group-portrait, "L'Ecole française depuis la révolution des Arts" or "French School since the French Revolution".
