cytochemical study of hydrophobic receptors in mouse peritoneal mast cells. The presence and distribution of hydrophobic glycolipid receptors in mast cells from the peritoneal cavity and lung of mice were investigated. Mast cells were labeled in vitro with lactoperoxidase/catalase-HRP and rabbit anti-mouse IgE.
Examination of peritoneal mast cells by light and electron microscopy in normal mice showed that most (approximately 90%) of the cells were peritoneal mast cells (PMC) rather than lung mast cells (LMC). Most of the mast cells contained both types of granules. Those that were negative for catalase contained both type of granules. Those that were positive for catalase or lactoperoxidase had few granules containing lectin (results considered representative of LMC). While both lung and peritoneal mast cells were examined by light and electron microscopy, distribution of catalase positive cells was more uniform among PMC. The results indicate that although the majority of mast cells are PMC, the presence of cytoplasmic granules that react with catalase and lactoperoxidase is related to a certain mast cell sub
